

1 Overview

When you are finished submit all your work through the MyClasses page for this class. Create a directory called Project2, compress this into a single zip file, and then submit this zip file to the Project #2 assignment. Also remember to create a make file and make sure the program compiles and runs on the lab Linux system.

Projects are to be done strictly on your own and as with all assignments the sharing of files and code is strictly prohibited and constitutes an act of Academic Misconduct. Furthermore the use of any electronic medium, such as code repositories, forums, blogs, message boards, email, etc. is strictly prohibited and constitutes an act of Academic Misconduct.

2 Program

The program you will be creating will simply read in and display some statistics for NBA and NFL player data. The important parts of the project are the class structures created and the inheritance hierarchy that is created.

Before we discuss the class structures you will be building we will discuss the file structure of the files you will be reading. All of these files are text files and they are CSV files (Comma Separated Values). This means that the data in the files are separated by a comma. These files are very common for reading into spreadsheets. The two files you will be reading are NBA.csv and NFL.csv. The NBA.csv file starts out as

#LastName,#FirstName,#Jersey Num,#Position,#Height,#Weight,#Birth Date
Abrines,Alex,8,F,6'6",190,8/1/1993
Acy,Quincy,4,PF,6'7",240,10/6/1990
Adams,Steven,12,C,7'0",255,7/20/1993
Afflalo,Arron,40,SG,6'5",215,10/15/1985

The first line is a header line. You are not to edit any of these files but you will not need to read in the header line, instead you will be skipping it in your code and reading the second line on to extract the data. Each line contains the data for one NBA player. Each line starts with the player's last name, then first name, then their number, then their position code, then their height, then their weight, and finally their date of birth.

The NFL.csv file starts out as

number,full_name,position,height_in_inches,weight_in_lbs,date_of_birth,team
23,"Alford, Robert",CB,70,186,11/1/1988,ATL
95,"Babineaux, Jonathan",DT,74,300,10/12/1981,ATL
72,"Baker, Sam",T,77,301,5/30/1985,ATL
59,"Bartu, Joplo",OLB,74,230,10/3/1990,ATL
71,"Biermann, Kroy",OLB,75,255,9/12/1985,ATL
63,"Blalock, Justin",G,76,326,12/20/1983,ATL

The first line is again a header line. Each line again contains the data for one NFL player. Each line starts with the player's number, then their formal name in quotes, then their position code, then their height in inches, then their weight, then their date of birth, and finally their team code.

You will be reading these files, extracting the values and loading them into specialized classes for storage and manipulation of the data, which we will define below. In addition to extracting substrings to get the data values you will need to convert these string values to numeric values. If you have not used the functions `atoi`, `atol`, and `atof` you may want to look these up.

Here are the class structures and their descriptions. As always, use separate specification files and implementation files, and there is no inline code.

Date: This class will hold the date of birth of the player. Note that this is the same as the `Date` class from the first project with two additions. Hence you can start with the `Date` class from the first project if you completed it correctly.

- The data for this class are three integers, one for the month, one for the day, and one for the year.
- Include a constructor that will take parameters for the month, day, and year, and load the values into the data members.
- Make sure that there is a default constructor.
- Include a `setDate` function that will take in the month, day, and year as parameters and set the values of the member variables.
- Overload all 6 relational operators. A date is less than another date if it would come first chronologically.
- Overload the stream out operator to output the date in the standard American format, for example, 12/25/2021.
- Add in the function `setMDY` that takes a single string parameter of a M/D/YYYY format and extracts the month, day, and year to populate the object. So the function should be able to parse strings like 3/5/2010, 10/9/2020, 12/25/2021, and 3/15/1975.
- Add in the function `toString` that returns a string in M/D/YYYY format for the stored date. That is, the string output should look like 3/5/2010, 10/9/2020, 12/25/2021, and 3/15/1975.

FeetInches: This class will hold the height of the player. Take the last `FeetInches` class example we went over in class when discussing operator overloading and add in the following two functions.

- Add in the function `setLength` that takes a single string parameter of a f'i" format and extracts the feet and inches to populate the object. So the function should be able to parse strings like 6'4", 5'10", and 7'0".
- Add in the function `toString` that returns a string in the same format as the stream out that we wrote in class, for example, 6 feet, 1 inches.

Person: This class will be the base class to our inheritance hierarchy. It will hold the data that is common to the players in both groups and that which can be associated with any person. The data fields should be the person's first name, last name, their height stored as a FeetInches type, their weight (as a double), and their date of birth stored as a Date data type. The functions for the class are below.

- Constructor that brings in the last name, first name, height as a FeetInches type, their weight as a double, and their date of birth stored as a Date data type.
- A default constructor that sets all strings to empty strings, doubles to 0, and the default values for the FeetInches and Date types.
- A function that returns a string of the person's formal name, i.e. Spickler, Don.
- A function that returns a string of the person's informal name, i.e. Don Spickler.
- A function to get the height of the person as a FeetInches data type.
- A function to get the weight of the person.
- A function to get the date of birth of the person as a Date data type.
- A toString function that returns a string containing the formal name, height, weight, and date of birth on a single line separated by "/", for example.

Vickerson, Kevin / 6 feet, 5 inches / 328.000000 / 1/8/1983

You do not need to worry about creating setters since the data will be set on construction. There will be no need to update the data.

NBAPlayer: This class will be a derived class off of the Person class. It will hold additional data for the NBA players. The additional data fields should be the person's playing number and their position code. The functions for the class are below.

- Constructor that brings in the same information as for the person class with the addition of the player number and position code.
- A default constructor that sets all strings to empty strings, doubles to 0, integers to -1, and the default values for the FeetInches and Date types.
- A function that returns a string of the person's position code.
- A function that returns an integer of the person's number.
- A toString function that returns a string containing the person string discussed above and at the end the player position, number, and finally NBA. For example,

Zimmerman, Stephen / 7 feet, 0 inches / 240.000000 / 9/9/1996 / C / 33 / NBA

You do not need to worry about creating setters here either since the data will be set on construction.

NFLPlayer: This class will be a derived class off of the Person class. It will hold additional data for the NFL players. The additional data fields should be the person's playing number, their position code, and their team code. The functions for the class are below.

- Constructor that brings in the same information as for the person class with the addition of the player number, position code, and team code.
- A default constructor that sets all strings to empty strings, doubles to 0, integers to -1, and the default values for the FeetInches and Date types.
- A function that returns a string of the person's position code.
- A function that returns an integer of the person's number.
- A function that returns a string of the person's team code.
- A toString function that returns a string containing the person string discussed above and at the end the player position, number, team, and finally NFL. For example,

Zeitler, Kevin / 6 feet, 4 inches / 315.000000 / 3/8/1990 / G / 68 / CIN / NFL

You do not need to worry about creating setters here either since the data will be set on construction.

Now create a main that uses these classes as follows. The main will create a vector named `PlayerInfo` that is a vector of `Person` pointers, that is, pointers to `Person` objects. The main should call the function `loadNBADataFile` that you will create. This function will take a filename and the `PlayerInfo` vector as parameters and load in the data from `NBA.csv` into the program. Specifically, it will read each line of the file, parse the line for the information needed, create a dynamic `NBAPlayer` object, and then store the pointer to that object in the vector. Your function call will simply be, loadNBADataFile("NBA.csv", PlayerInfo);

The main should then call the function `loadNFLDataFile` that you will create. This function will take a filename and the `PlayerInfo` vector as parameters and load in the data from `NFL.csv` into the program. Specifically, it will read each line of the file, parse the line for the information needed, create a dynamic `NFLPlayer` object, and then store the pointer to that object in the vector. Your function call will simply be, loadNFLDataFile("NFL.csv", PlayerInfo);

At this point all of the data will have been loaded into the program.

Create a print function that takes in as its only parameter a vector of `People` pointers and prints the contents to the screen using the `toString` functions that were created. Hence the `toString` functions must be dynamically bound.

Also create three sorting functions `sortByName`, `sortByHeight`, and `sortByWeight`. Each takes in as its only parameter a vector of `People` pointers. The first will sort the entries by the person's name. The second by their height, and the third by their weight. Don't be tempted to use the algorithm library's sort function, this would require an overload of logical operators for the `People` class and allow only one type of sort. You may implement the bubble sort, insertion, or selection sorts for these. Note that when you are moving entries of the vector around you are really just moving the addresses in the vector. The data items themselves are discrete packets of information in memory that the vector is simply pointing at. We looked at an example of this early on in the course with arrays of pointers.

Have the main do the following after the data is loaded.

1. Print out the original list of all the data. That would be with all the NBA players first and then all the NFL players.
2. Sort the entire database by name. Then print this new list out.
3. Create another vector of Person pointers named TallPlayers. Put all the players that are over 6'11" (that is 7 feet or taller) into this list. Sort this list by height and print it out to the screen. Also, print out the number of players in that group.
4. Create another vector of Person pointers named BigPlayers. Put all the players that are over 350 pounds into this list. Sort this list by weight and print it out to the screen. Also, print out the number of players in that group.
5. Find the maximum height of all the players. Create another vector of Person pointers named TallestPlayers. Load all the players that are this maximum height into the list, sort by name and print the list out.
6. Find the oldest players, load them into another vector of Person pointers named OldestPlayers. Sort by name and print the list out.
7. Find the youngest players, load them into another vector of Person pointers named YoungestPlayers. Sort by name and print the list out.
8. Clear all used memory so that there are no memory leaks.

Complete output of the program:

Number of players in files: 2391
